

A Favorite Verse

To love like poetry is to love in fragments, to find a universe in the spaces between your fingers.
It is not about the grand, loud declarations,
but the quiet ink that stains the soul.
I do not want to hold you like a possession;
I want to read you like a favorite verse,
memorizing your tragedies,
and rewriting your peace,
over and over,
until we are both just lines on a timeless page.

To love you like poetry is to accept the silence.
It is knowing that I might never hold your hand in a crowded room,
yet choosing to write your name in the margins of my soul.

I don't want a loud, screaming kind of love.
I want the quiet ink—
the kind that bleeds into the pages of the night,
making you immortal,
even when you are just a ghost in my memory
